HOW THEY WERE DISCOVERED,

Or Mr. and Mrs. Ford and a New Jersey Trunk,

It is a somewhat singular psychological fact that when the only pebble on the beach discovers the only other pebble in the universe, that circumstance will not escape the polite attention of the other pebbles who have not yet become elective affinities. Thus it happened that when Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Ford, jr., of the quiet town of Salem, N. J., on Wednesday last were happily married, they set out for Wash ington to escape the gush of the marries and the envy of the and incidentally the old shoes, rice, chest buts and other amenities of the young people who got left. They talked to each other several times on the way to Wash-ington, and as the handsome bridegroom was untagged, and as there was no ric in the golden glory of the charming bride's tresses, not one of the passengers knew that Mrs. Ford was the slightest relation to Mr. Ford. Nor was Mrs. Ford to be caught napping at Willard's Hotel, where she never once asked Mr. Ford in presence of the walters if he took sugar in his coffee, or whether he preferred coffee to tea, nor did he or she say any of those timeworn things which attract atten-tion, and least of all did Mr. Ford, jr., fail to read the paper at meals to the utter exclusion of Mrs. Ford from his universe Yet forsooth, and marry come up, the Salemites were not unmindful that the bride and groom ought to have a pleasant time in Washington, so, yesterday morning, Mr. and Mrs. Ford received by express a very old trunk, whose canyons and other fissures were picturesquely obliterated by "poster pictures" to the effect that the trunk was addressed to "Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Ford, jr.," inscribed "Don't we look happy," and reminding the public that it should congratulate "Mr." and "Mrs." Ford, their titles being underscored and accentuated; and in fine that there weren't near as many pebbles now in New Jersey as there used to be. Soon after the arrival of the trunk a Times man called at the hotel, but it was found that the trunk had come and this impervious couple had trunk is, however, still at Willard's.

A message is expected this morning from the authorities of the convent announcing the decision of the directiess in reference to the terms upon which Mrs. Harvell desires her daughter to enter, and upon this decision will be based the future action of the members of the young lady's family Miss Harvell's trunk, which was carried from the house just previous to her de parture, was taken last night from its place of concealment in the Farquhar home to the house of a friend of Miss Harvell, where it will remain sub Ject to her orders.

The Young Husband Refuses to Be Responsible for Her Debts-The Families' Statements.

"I hereby notify the public that I will not be responsible for any debts contracted by my wife, Augusta Goddard, from this date. - JOSEPH A. GODDARD."

This notification was published last evening, and behind it lies another story of two young people of this city who have failed to satisfactorily solve the problem, 'How to be happy, though married." Joseph A. Goddard is a young man who

as just emerged from his minority, but e has been a husband for nearly three years. nd for more than a year and a half has een a father. He has yel to serve one year of his apprenticeship to the trade of brick-layer, working with his father, W. W. Goddard, of 920 Tenth street northwest. His wife, Augusta, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William J. W. Grey, and has been living with her parents since last spring, eir home now being at the corner of First nd California streets northeast

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Goddard were arried in 1894, and they made their hom with Mr. Goddard's parents on Tenth street The bridegroom had not left school at the time of the ceremony. Mrs. Goddard was vivacious and had the social instinct highly developed, and as the honeymoon waned and the accessities of a life unsupplied with business. How push, except by ad- limited luxuries had to be faced, she found it hard to harmonize her ideals with the reality. Friends of both families had to admit that the young people did not live happily, but they differ as to the cause; 'mother-indaw," say the Greys; "innate flightiness of the wife," say the Goddards. Several times the young wife left ber boy usband, and last spring she returned to her parents' home for good. In December last she instituted proceedings for divorce, and the busband has since entered a cross-bill. A girl baby was born about a year and a half ago.

A Times reporter called at the homes of both parties last evening to learn the cause of the publication of the notice by Mr. Goddard. This gentleman was not at home, but his mother was seen She said that a young man had called at her house a day or two ago. He rep a specialty of furnishing houses on the easy-payment plan. He said Mrs. Joseph A Goddard had ordered some furniture and the firm was desirous of knowing exactly who was responsible and what likelihood there was of receiving money if the goods were delivered to Mrs. God dard. The order has not been filled, and the notification of non-responsibility by Mr. Goddard was a consequence of the young man's call at the Goddard domicile. Mrs. W. W. Goddard, mother and mother in-law of the young people, spoke of the trouble with some rejuctance. She said her son had no means, had not earned a dollar in the last year, and that he had been sorely tried by his wife's conduct. Young Mrs. Goddard had been very anxious to get a bleycle, but her husband had been unable to afford her that luxury. She has a wheel now. The elder Mrs. Goddard made it evident that she does not approve of wheels for married women When The Times man called at the Grey residence at 9:45 p. m. young Mrs. Goddard had not returned from her evening's outing, and the reporter was greeted by ber mother, Mrs. W. J. W. Grey. She was agitated and refused to say a word on the natter, and declared that her daughter if at home, would likewise refuse to make any statement whatever. Among all the differences of the family Both sides declare that Joseph and Au gusta will never come together again The Greys used to live at 121 F street northeast, and only recently have moved into the larger house at the corner, and it was for the new domicile that Mrs Joseph A. Goddard ordered the furnitus

He Addressed His Adherents From the Outside and Then Withdrew-The Next Move.

Serious trouble, with every prospect of bloodshed, was probably averted at the Salem Paptist Church yesterday morning by the assignment of Sergt. Kenney and a squad of six of the most stalwart officers from No. 8 station, for duty in front of Notwithstanding the fact that the in junction restraining the church deacons from interfering with his religious service was rescinded by Judge Cox on Saturday the Rev. Geriah Lamkins, with his band of supporters, was on hand, as usual, to conduct the morning services. But the board of trustees, Sam Taylor, T. F. Carter Charles Harris, Thomas Johnson, Joseph Berry, S. T. Carter, and George Jackson, flanked by the sturdlest of their followers, were also on hand, and stood in front of the church door prepared to oppose Mr. Lamkin's entrance.

Inside services were already in progress, onducted by the Rev. Dr. Ford, of the Metropolitan Colored M. E. Church, who had been invited by the trustees to fill the pulpit. The congregation consisted mostly of women, the men remaining outside to participate in the heavy work. Thick walking sticks were in evidence on both sides and the taunts and threatening glances exchanged boded little good to the peace of the neighborhood,

The danger, however, was dispelled by the deposed shepherd himself, who, after being informed by Sergt Kenney that if his attempts at entrance precipitated an affray, he, as well as the others, would be arrested, decided that discretion was the better part of valor and departed, followed by the members of his fleck who still adhere to him.

It is probable that Mr. Lamkins will take out a writ of mandamus to compel the board of trustees to hand over the church property to the new board of trustees, who were elected by his faction at the last meeting. They will, of course, refuse, and this will again precipitate the matter int Through Sleeping Cars to Toledo, Mothers, to convene here this week. Motherhood is one of the most potent surroundings of the young soul. In the text, Christ dying upon the cross at the age of thirty-three, commends his mother to John's double love and care. Never was there a mother who had such a son, and never a son had such a mother. Humanly speaking, He owed much to His mother for his fine human nature and sympathics.

Motherhood is not all the woman's world -she has many fields of usefulness - but it is one of her continents. When motherhood has come the woman by the cradle has suddenly become a teacher and a queen. This woman has suddenly become what philosophers call an encompassment and what the painters call an atmosphere. The mission of the modern mother, in
